

Teaching and Learning

Mushiba: As we learn, we are called upon by The Universe to share and teach what we have learned ~ it is a two-sided coin that helps each of us to grow. Waith was asked, during one of his public gatherings, about levels of understanding and the relaying of that information from teacher to student:

Question: “While a teacher may know many levels of understanding on a particular subject, and knowing that the student is capable of grasping or assimilating only a certain level of understanding, is that teacher justified in relating only that information that the student can assimilate?”

Waith: “That is part of the responsibility that goes with being a teacher ~ understanding what the student can assimilate. Some teachers are brought to students who have a strong need for many levels of understanding, yet they are only at an introductory level. The teacher, however, must teach at the level that the student can understand, and then bring a student into each new level.

“All energies outside of The Universal Consciousness, in teaching their own levels of understanding will, therefore, increase their own levels of understanding. It is difficult when a teacher reaches a level of awareness that encompasses many levels to then bring the teachings into levels of understanding that are lower than their highest level. Yet, the better they are as a teacher means they are able to adjust to any level that is needed for understanding.”

Each of us is a teacher and a learner: as we teach, we learn and as we learn, we teach ~ it is the neverending circle!
